WORKING PAPERS	Who Signs Matters? Compliance Titles and Hedge Fund Disclosures (Job Market Paper) Abstract: Hedge funds have incentives to conceal portfolio positions and may strategically misreport their holdings in mandatory public disclosures. We use Form 13F signature blocks to identify the personnel assigned formal reporting responsibility, distinguishing dedicated compliance titles from titles that include investment management or other functions. Filings signed by dedicated compliance personnel are less likely to be amended subsequently than those signed by executive or investment-leadership personnel, with the association concentrated in delayed restatements rather than prompt corrections or amendments adding previously undisclosed holdings. The delayed-restatement association persists after accounting for original-filing discrepancies and reported verification arrangements. Following a restatement's public release, abnormal stock returns are more closely aligned with the direction of reported position revisions when dedicated compliance personnel signed the original filing than under other signing roles. These findings highlight the allocation of formal reporting responsibility as an observable dimension of hedge fund governance, associated with both subsequent amendments and the market response to restatements.
